

Psychosocial problems and adjustment among parents of children with attention deficit hyperactivity disorders

Muhammad, Shadya Fatthi

Zagazig Univ. (EGY). Fac. of Nursing

M.Sc. 2007

This study aimed at assess psychosocial problems parents of children with ADHD, and to assess the strategies these parents apply to adjust with these problems. A descriptive exploratory design was utilized in this study. The study conducted at psychiatric outpatient clinic in El-Khalafawi at Cairo. A sample of convenience of 50 parents and their children coming to the above mentioned sitting were recruited for this study. Three tools were used for data collection; child Medical and Developmental Data sheet, Psychosocial problems of parents strategy scale was not statistically significantly correlated with age of child, family size, birth order and child education level.

Scale, Parental coping strategy Inventory (PSCI). Finding of this of this study indicated that, Age and child education level were statistically significantly correlated with total psychosocial problems of parents scale, family size and birth order were highly statistically significantly correlated with interaction with healthy sibling and actual support subscales. Total parental coping strategy scale was not statistically significantly correlated with age of child, family size, birth order and child education level.